Boromir: The Bulwark of the West

In the section of the Lord of the Rings in which Boromir's glory is often shadowed by Aragorn, however, Boromir's title "Bulwark of the West" is not awarded in vain. Boromir's fall often judges him yet he is one of the greatest men of the third age. Boromir's strengths are in his leadership, his unwavering honor, and pure power.

Boromir is seen as foolish next to Aragorn, but simple is more accurate. He does not understand magic and the hands pulling the strings, but relies on truth of goodness. If Boromir had been a prideful man, he would have tried to control the company. Boromir knew Aragorn to be the High King and his loyalty never wavered.

When Boromir spoke proud of Elenor's council, it was just cause. Often Boromir had ~~led~~ led deserted forces to victory, turned fear to hope, and watched lowly soldiers die fighting to keep the evil at bay.
Boromir was humble, content with a title given to him by his men. Never was Boromir seen as taking other men's glory, never gloating over personal triumphs. His first love was Gondor, and he had honor, it was Gondor, Boromir walked through life the only "man" to beat back the Nazgul. A small fact unknown to most of the Company, he single handedly beat back the Nazgul to save Gondor.
