Palomar College offers advice on career change

SAN MARCOS — John Dise says there are too many people who are unhappy in their jobs.

That is why he is making 1990 the “Year of the Career Change” at Palomar College’s Career Center.

“Too many individuals are dissatisfied with their present jobs but don’t want to change or learn to find a more satisfying career,” said Dise, director of the career center and a Palomar counselor for 17 years.

“My advice to those people is to stop procrastinating and follow a New Year’s resolution in 1990 to explore that career change they have been thinking about.”

Dise is inviting Palomar College students and district residents to stop by the career center for advice and counseling.

“At Palomar we can help people identify their strengths and guide them to an exciting career,” Dise said. “Our tangible program has helped many people to discover a meaningful life.”

Dise acknowledges that career changes often require training at night or on weekends and financial hardships.

But, he said, “sometimes a person’s standard of living has to dip for a while in order to rise later … how many times does a person look back and wish he had started something that could have been completed by now?”
